GEORGIANA AUGUSTA FREDERICA ELLIOTT

From a portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds (1723-92), famous English painter and first President of the Royal Academy. Apart from his facility of line and delicacy of coloring, he was especially gifted in bringing out the spiritual qualities of his subject, and the skill with which he has depicted the innocence of the child's face and the unstudied grace of her attitude goes far toward explaining his pre-eminence among the greatest portrait painters of all time.

Fourth in series of reproductions of notable paintings in the Metropolitan Museum of Art, selected personally for the Mid-Week Pictorial by Dr. Edward Robinson, Director of the Museum.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS

on a miniature scale in the Madison School kindergarten of St. Paul, where of twelve pupils attending the morning session, ten represent as many different countries. THE LATE ALFRED H. SMITH, WITH HIS GRANDDAUGHTER

From a recent portrait, painted by A. Muller-Ury, of the late President of the New York Central Lines and one of the best known railroad executives in the United States, whose tragic death occurred on March 8 when he was thrown from his horse in Central Park while reining in suddenly to avoid a collision. Mr. Smith, who was 59 years old, had risen from the ranks, beginning as a messenger boy at $4 a week and going through various grades until he became the head of the New York Central system, with a salary of $100,000 a year, fighting his way upward by sheer ability and force of character. During the World War he was Eastern Regional Director, with no less than one hundred railway companies with 80,000 miles of main-line tracks under his immediate control.

FIFTH AVENUE

Guardians of Our Richest Thoroughfare

AMERICAN visitors to Paris will remember how many times, in closing the Boulevards in front of the Madeleine or the Opera, the final Day of Judgment seemed to be bearing down upon them with unpleasant swiftness. Even in London, where things are ordered more peacefully, taxis whiz past on the left side of the road with unpleasant abruptness.

But in New York, since Fifth Avenue was divided of into sections and the system of blinking lights from the traffic towers in the middle of the roadway installed, traffic moves along in an orderly manner North and South and then East and West when the lights change, while the policemen's whistles echo and re-echo above the noise of the streets.

The duties of the traffic policeman, who keeps clear this thoroughfare of the world's richest city, are one of both danger and daring. Not every motor spells an experienced driver, or a careful one. There have been many casualties in the ranks of the traffic policemen. The traffic officer is also a diplomat, who settles the arguments which grow out of disputed right of way, cutting across bows, and other complications of the amenities of driving.

The men who keep the laws in force on the Avenue are attached to the two Traffic Divisions in which the Island of Manhattan is divided, and number about a thousand uniformed men. They are all full-fledged members of the Police Force, assigned to duty with the Traffic Division by order of the Police Commissioner, and are subject to transfer at his orders. The arbitrary dividing line between the two divisions is at Forty-second street.

Enormous increases in the traffic which moves up and down the Avenue, as a result of the crowded condition of the city, has doubled the responsibilities of the traffic men within the last few years. In the days when the upper Avenue, in the Forties, still bore the impression of the days of "stoops," the speed of passing vehicles was gauged by the pace of horses. Those were the days when the fur-coated Young Man About Town, who knows no speed laws, was still unknown. And with the passing of the "stoops" passed the old family coachman, whose complexion was not wholly due to the rigors of winter winds across the Park.

The traffic policeman on the Avenue, though he may be an expert in appraisal of the values of the vehicles which pass him by, is no respecter of persons. The lordly Rolls Royce, if it disobey the law, receives its measure of censure as impartially as the Ford.
